What a Foreign Policy For the Middle Class Looks Like: Realism and Restraint Amid Global Conflict

This question has attracted growing attention in recent years, as Americans have tired of sending their money and their family members to fund and fight foreign conflicts not vital to their own safety and security. They have questioned why American manufacturing jobs that once underpinned thriving Midwestern communities are now in China and Mexico. And they wonder why government officials and media titans are so slow to address their concerns and so quick to label them “isolationists” for asking.

What should be done? The Quincy Institute for Responsible Statecraft and The American Conservative brought together Congressional representatives, journalists, and thought leaders to provide answers, including keynotes from Senator J.D. Vance (R-OH), Senator Rand Paul, & former presidential candidate Vivek Ramaswamy.

The Myth of Mass Incarceration

The idea that the United States is an overly carceral country infected with the scourge of “mass incarceration” is deeply embedded in American culture. But it is simply not true, especially taking into account what the phrase actually means in practice and comparing the number of people in prison to the scope and scale of crime committed in the United States. Only a fraction of people who commit crimes are imprisoned—even those who commit violent crimes. Those who support a radical decarceration agenda have gained some headway in their goals by pushing out through various channels the myth that the United States locks up too many people. In reality, the United States likely locks up too few.
